Standing Rock Showdown—#NODAPL

On November 20th the police violently attacked peaceful water protectors at Standing Rock. Police used tear gas, rubber bullets, pepper spray, sound (concussion) grenades, and sprayed them with water cannons in subfreezing conditions. Hundreds of people were injured.

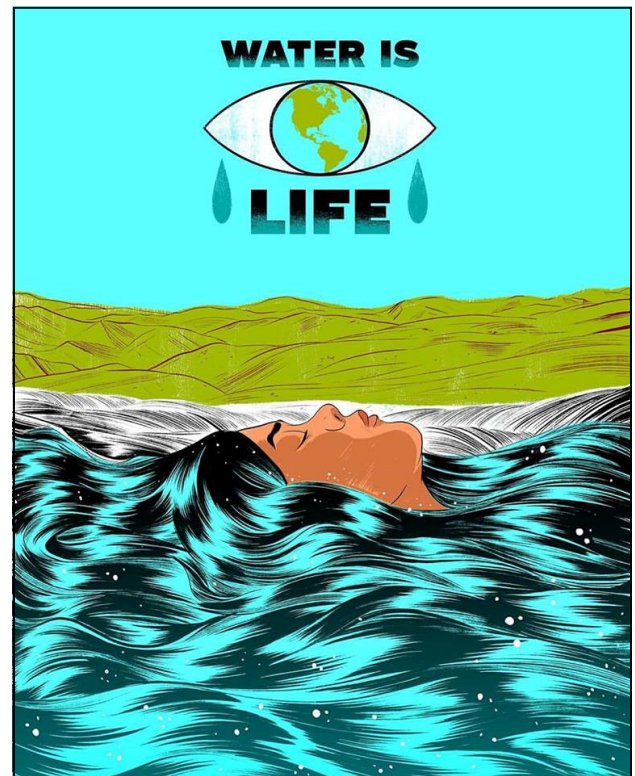

Approximately 300 Native American and non-native protesters were injured in the 10-hour clash with law enforcement, and 26 were taken to hospitals with severe head and limb wounds, eye trauma, internal bleeding and hypothermia from being doused with water in 22-degree weather.

In response, a coalition of groups are calling for a week of action starting on November 25th and culminating in a Global Day of Action on December 1st. Demonstrators will gather at Kerr Park in Downtown Oklahoma City at 9:00 am on December 1st. Dress warm, and bring signs and banners.

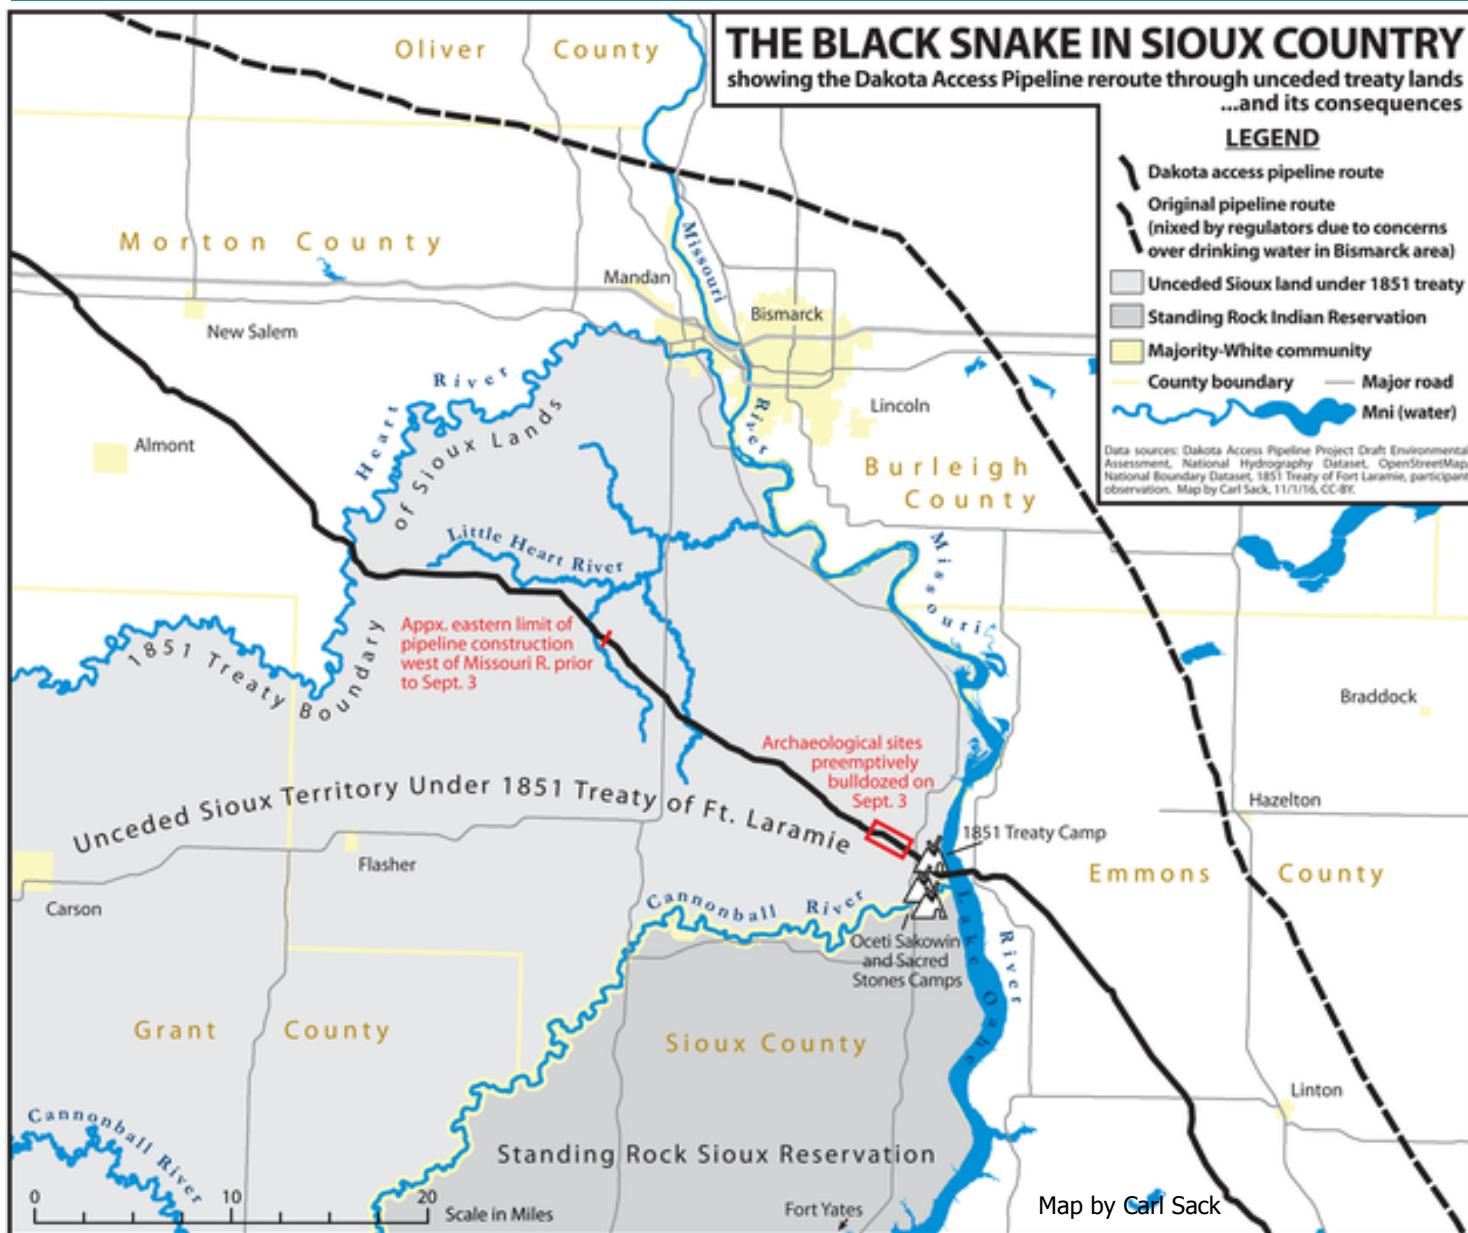

Standing Rock Sioux Reservation in southern North Dakota, is the site of an escalating months-long standoff between law enforcement-backed security contractors and activists that has so far resulted in multiple injuries, more than 500 arrests, and a United Nations investigation of potential human rights abuses.

Dakota Access project poses two immediate threats. First, the pipeline would run beneath Lake Oahe, the reservoir that provides drinking water to the people of Standing Rock. (An earlier route that avoided native lands was ruled out in part because it posed a danger to other drinking water supplies.)

Second, according to the Standing Rock Sioux tribe, the building of the pipeline would destroy the sacred spots and burial grounds that were overlooked in the Corps of Engineers' assessment. The protests have intensified, and more outsiders, including members of more than 200 Native American tribes from across North America, have become involved. Standing Rock has, for some, come to represent something much bigger than a struggle between a disenfranchised people and a government-backed, billion-dollar corporation. It's a battle to save humanity from itself.

From the Huffington Post, "The government says the $3.7 billion Dakota Access Pipeline is the safest, most efficient way to carry crude oil from North Dakota to Illinois. But the project has become a rallying point for Native Americans because the pipe would cut under the Missouri River within a mile of the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation, potentially contaminating the local tribes' source of fresh water and encroaching on land that the U.S. government had agreed to set aside for them in an 1851 treaty. The clash between protesters, who call themselves "water protectors," and North Dakota law enforcement reached a boiling point on Sunday, when force was used to keep protesters off a barricaded bridge about a mile south of the pipeline construction site."

The financial footing of the Dakota Access Pipeline is in jeopardy if they do not complete the project by January 1st. If this deadline is missed, a majority of the stakeholders with contracts to ship oil through the pipeline will be able to renegotiate or cancel their contracts. This could be devastating to Energy Transfer Partners and the other pipeline companies behind DAPL. With its vulnerabilities exposed, solidarity efforts are needed now more than ever.

On December 4, hundreds of veterans plan to "deploy" to Standing Rock Indian Reservation in North Dakota to join in protest against the planned Dakota Access Pipeline and draw national attention to the cause. And while the Corps of Engineers says it has no plans to forcibly remove protesters, it announced that all federal lands north of the Cannonball River would be closed to public access on December 5th. This land includes the main protest camp.
